Student: What I found interesting about the videos was when like first looking at it, it just seemed like something easy, I'd say, or something that everyone would know about already.

But when you actually sat down and watched the video, it really opened your understanding and I'd say like broadened your knowledge about how simple things can really be important.

Something very interesting that those videos taught me, like something important, is that like you need to slow down.

And things start becoming a lot more easier that way when you slow down.

And overall, I learned that if I piece out things little by little starting like weeks in advance, it can be very, very beneficial.

When I currently watch that video, it was, it was right about the time of finals actually, because I'd watch those videos I had actually started studying like a month in advance and I would like break up every single chapter that there was in my course work.

So eventually I got to the last week where I had say one more week to study.

And then in that last week that I would have normally began studying, I just got to do a little recap of everything and just freshened my knowledge about what was going to be on the final.

So it really, really was a game changer for me in my studying life.

I'm currently enrolled in three different summer courses through Tarleton State University, and I'm still using that same strategy that I learned in that one simple video.
